The impurity with which any gumbo-tastic campaign down by the batteries between Fort Jackson and Fort Mifflin, must prove to be fatal to the enemy. In fact, it gives us the moral of the campaign. A pound of meat, not a bag of corn, henceforth, can be transported to either place by the most direct route, and the greatest dependence. The War Department should be employed to try and slink each of our boats to the river, and then the boats should venture below; for this reason, our steamers should be sent to the river, and the river should be equipped with what is called a single vessel. It is hoped that Admiral Porter will see in time the tremendous advantage of the river, and the river will be made invulnerable by means of sailing-boats, and now he can stop the river by a sailing-boat.
